

Navigating the Tides of Power at the Biden-Xi Filoli Dialogue

The upcoming meeting between US President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping (15 Nov 2023) at the Filoli Estate, in the context of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit, is more than a diplomatic rendezvous; it's a pivotal moment in global geopolitics. This first face-to-face interaction since Nov 2022 comes at a time when US-China relations are at a critical juncture, shaped by complex issues ranging from trade disputes to the role of artificial intelligence (AI) in military advancements.

The agenda is broad, addressing crucial topics like trade tensions, the crackdown on fentanyl exports, human rights, the volatile situation in Taiwan, the Russian-Ukraine crisis, and the contentious usage of AI in nuclear arsenals. These discussions will lay bare the strategic priorities and tactical approaches of the world's two largest economies.

China, experiencing a post-COVID economic slowdown, finds itself at a crossroads, seeking global engagement and investment to rejuvenate its economy. Conversely, the US is focused on ensuring fair economic practices, particularly concerning technology transfer and intellectual property rights.

Despite the significance of this meeting, the consensus suggests that it is unlikely to be a reset button for strained relations. The skepticism surrounding China's alignment between public commitments and actual actions persists, especially in areas like climate change where collaboration is vital.

This summit is a microcosm of shifting global dynamics, with the potential outcomes poised to either bridge cooperation or escalate tensions. These developments will have extensive implications, influencing international alliances and economic policies.
